

of orthographies (Kavanagh & Venezky, 1980). Only a few pages, unfortunately, are devoted to cognitive aspects of composing text.

Chapter 12 contains an introductory survey of research on word recognition in listening and reading. Chapter 13 presents an overview of topics related to language comprehension and memory: syntactic aspects of language decoding, processes of decoding, the role of knowledge and inference in language comprehension, and short- and long-term memory influences. Although the authors present a review of the classic experiments on syntactic and semantic influences on comprehension, they hardly address most recent research on text processing (e.g., discourse structure, cohesion, schemata; Spiro, Bruce, & Brewer, 1980).

The final two chapters review the cognitive, neurological, and developmental aspects of language and communication. The authors do well in presenting oral language and nonverbal aspects of language disorders and growth but do omit much research in their coverage in written language acquisition. This is understandable because research on acquisition of written language is only recently emerging (Teale & Sulzby, 1986).

In spite of the less than adequate coverage of psycholinguistic aspects of written communication (probably attributable to limitations of space), Ellis and Beattie successfully integrate research on psycholinguistic theory and verbal and nonverbal communication. It is in this synthesis that the authors make a significant contribution to the psycholinguistically based communications literature.
