Feeling Stones

Feeling stones are a great resource to help support children to recognise and express their emotions and develop empathy.

Follow the instructions on the next page to create your feeling stones.

Here are some ideas of how to use your feeling stones:

- With a small group of children, turn the stones face down. Ask children to take it in turns to choose a stone from the group. They keep the picture to themselves and act out the emotion to the rest of the group. Can the group decide which emotion the child is acting out?
- With an individual or with a small group, ask children to choose a stone that best represents how they are feeling today and discuss this if they are happy to.
- With an individual, small group or class, ask children to choose a stone that best represents the emotions of a character(s) at different points in a story.
- With an individual who is feeling uncomfortable emotions or is dysregulated but wants to talk, use the feeling stones to support the child to discuss what has happened to make them feel this way, how they are feeling now and how they might move forwards. Or, use the feeling stones to explore the incident once some time
