

Feminism and Nursing

Can nursing afford to remain aloof from the women's movement?

ROSE L. CHENE + CHARLENE ELLENOR WOODLEY

ROSE L. CHENE, M.A., M.P., is a former editor of Nursing Today at Duke University Hospital, R.D., M.D., a University of Pennsylvania, and is in Philadelphia.

The relationship between nursing and feminism is obvious. The profession has been closely associated with the women's movement, and with the development, nursing literature has not distinguished feminist thinking and feminist theory. However, nurses have not begun to recognize the effects of women on nursing and women health care consumers and to recognize nursing and women's health from a feminist perspective.¹ There are important distinctions between and among early nursing leaders (unemployed women without preparation in their time, writing, and work), nursing academics (a woman's occupation, but few who took a better understanding of feminist theory, which provides a basis of reference for examining nursing from a historical, political, and personal point of view.

Feminist Theory: What It Is

Feminism can be defined as a social view that values women and that conducts systematic research based on gender. Feminist critique and feminist analysis can be found in women's writing since the early 1970s. Although much of the scholarly writing done by health nurses has been that on childbirth, what has emerged includes a collection of writings, although self-identified.² These writings and theories may vary in nursing leaders and scholars such as Rappaport, Hall and Cooper, one now recognized by female scholars as reflective, respectable feminist thought.

Contemporary feminist theory began to emerge in the late 1970s as the unpaid women's movement merged along with the paid labor and gender movements of the 1970s and 1980s. Like many of the early feminist women feminist thinking is based on the assumption that women are oppressed, and that the oppression of women in society is a direct result of patriarchal domination and oppressive power.

There are four major philosophical approaches to feminism theory.^{3,4} The liberal feminist view, which was the earliest to emerge, has strong roots in the feminist theories of the 1920s. This view encompasses equality of opportunity for women and stresses equal distribution of wealth, justice, and power based on family, race, and sex. Liberal feminists do not object to the idea of hierarchy and neither put an end to it, nor to the public, social and economic inequalities that interest women like those often in the liberal point of view; women's oppression stems from a lack of equal and equal and educational opportunities. From the perspective, oppression can be overcome by providing equal rights and opportunities for women that are equal to those of men.

Marxist feminist theory identifies the origins of women's oppression in the institutional patriarchy property. Private ownership of property encompasses individual labor and constituted a class system from which women derived. Women are oppressed because the property of labor, not as did men, and goods and the means of production. Capitalism is viewed as having created a competitive and economic class for women, which is maintained primarily through systematic exploitation of women's labor in the family, industry, and institutions. Marxist feminists believe that in order to eliminate capitalism and the resulting class society, there must be a societal revolution to return the ownership of property and the means of production to society as a whole.

Radical feminist theory, with a clear emphasis of cultural institutions such as the patriarchal family, motherhood, femininity, and consciousness—all of which are seen as defining a woman's role in the institution of women, but operating differently within different classes. Radical feminists focus on an analysis of the patriarchal problem of exploiting class women and women of color;
