

NAKAHARA CHŪYA: FIVE POEMS

Nakahara Chūya (1907–1937) is one of modern Japan's most celebrated poets. Although he wrote tanka as a schoolboy, Japanese dadaist poetry seems to have allowed him as a teenager to open up his enormous creative potential and experiment with form and content. He never totally abandoned dadaism in his poetry, but, as he matured, symbolist aesthetics learned from the nineteenth-century French poets he had read and translated began to take hold of him. Chūya's knowledge of French poetry was drawn from both the texts themselves and from secondary reading. One important example of the latter was a Japanese translation of Arthur Symonds' "Symbolist Movement in Literature." He took particular interest in Symonds' characterization of Verlaine's poetry as "pure music, the voice of a bird with a human soul."

Chūya's poetry is perhaps the most musically accomplished among modern Japanese poets, an effect derived primarily from rhythm. He uses the traditional syllabic counts of five and seven from haiku, but frequently varies this rhythm with alternative beats, creating interesting syncopations. Unfortunately, his rich music has been lost in the majority of English translations, despite Chūya's own partiality to music over content. I have attempted to capture this music by deploying some of the more conspicuous sound devices in English: alternating meters and rhyme. The poems provided here are from Chūya's second book "Poems of Bygone Days," published posthumously by his friend and twentieth-century Japan's greatest literary critic, Kobayashi Hideo.

On the Lake

When the crisp moon ventures out,
We'll climb into the little boat.
The waves will lap in gentle sets,
With breezes also joining us.

The water will be draped in darkness
And the sound of dripping oars—
Between the pauses in your voice—
Will be an intimate of ours.

The moon will listen in on us,
And will even dip a bit,
Will be just above our heads
When we begin to kiss.

And you'll begin to talk again,
You'll pout and chatter on—
I'll listen without a drop of sound,
My hands rowing faithfully along.

When the crisp moon ventures out,
We'll climb into the little boat.
The waves will lap in gentle sets,
With breezes also joining us.
