Editorial on the Research Topic Eye in systemic diseases

The systemic diseases might involve the eyes in many ways, either with typical signs and symptoms or, often, with atypical presentation.

A rapid diagnosis may promote prompt treatment and a better clinical outcome in different cases.

Ocular involvement is present in metabolic, vascular, and rheumatologic diseases with retinopathy, inflammation, ocular surface, and corneal involvement. It may also be observed in different genetic syndromes. On the other hand, several systemic therapies may induce ocular changes, potentially affecting visual acuity.

This Research Topic aims to provide as comprehensive as possible information on ocular changes in systemic diseases, the signs, and symptoms that should be considered when systemic diseases are suspected. Additionally, it aims to evidence the ocular involvement in systemic disease and to highlight the necessity of the multidisciplinary approach for diagnosis and treatment.

Diabetes is undoubtedly the most common disease, with increasing prevalence worldwide, that involves different organs and tissues with diabetic angiopathy and neuropathy. It affects the eye with many degrees of severity diabetic retinopathy (DR) and cornea with tiny fibers neuropathy that affects the corneal sub-basal nerve plexus and may lead to severe visual impairment. In addition, it was reported that DR could be associated with cardiovascular involvement and stroke (1, 2).

Barrot et al. evaluated the role of diabetic retinopathy as a predictor of cardiovascular morbidity and mortality in subjects with type 2 diabetes in the Catalonia (Spain) population.

The authors investigated the predictive value of DR with its severity with the incidence of major cardiovascular events such as coronary heart disease, stroke, and all-cause mortality in subjects with T2DM in a Mediterranean region. They concluded that DR is related to coronary heart disease, macrovascular events, and all-cause mortality among persons with T2DM. The authors highlighted the importance of prompt screening and proper treatment of diabetic patients with DR to avoid cardiovascular complications leading to death.

Continuing with diabetes, another paper focused on the association between serum magnesium levels and diabetic macula edema (DME) in patients with DR (Xiang et al.). The systemic conditions that result from reduced serum magnesium might worsen the DR and promote DME with severe visual impairment (3).
