Suntech, once the star of China's PV industry, now is a highly distressed company under bankruptcy protection towards restructure of business activities. From Suntech's founding to its uncertain future prospects, the paper discussed the company's growth story as a good case study to discuss the opportunities and risks resulting from China's approach to industrial development, which is motivated by booming local economic growth. In the article, we first stated the evolution of Suntech and analyzed the risk factors which lead to the bankruptcy of Suntech under Kaplan's new risk management and risk categorization framework. A conclusion that the broader strategy of booming economy should be oriented in the healthy enterprise-growth based approach is introduced at the end of the paper.

A Lighthouse "Angel Investment": Wuxi's Case for Suntech

A number of industry observers and journalists have suggested that the Chinese government's support of the PV industry was part of a broader strategy to boom star industries, such as re-nu-able energy, TMT, biotech, etc. However, looking at how the PV industry grew in China and how this growth was managed, the idea of a grand scheme overestimates the Chinese state's executive capabilities. Furthermore, it is far too simplistic because it does not consider the difficult power relationships and competition between Chinese regions and private actors. The reality of industrial development in China is much more complex, and the central government's capability to oversee and influence local decision making should not be over-estimated. The way Suntech's relationship with the Wuxi local government evolved over time indicates how the Chinese specifics provide good opportunity for growth, yet at the same time also entail very specific risk characteristics.

In regard to the development of an advanced industrial base, Chinese cities and provinces are in a stiff competition against each other. The competition reaches down to the level of giving direct support to individual companies (Steven, 2009). One typical program is the city of Wuxi's Young Talents Program. It proved to be effective. When in 2000 Suntech's founder, Zhengrong Shi, began to look for opportunities to start a company in China, he was introduced to this program through Zhang Weiguo, a manager of the local government-owned Wuxi High-Tech Venture Capital who funds Dr. Shi provided 2 million which includes a 1.6 million technology-joined stock along with 8 major local SOEs facilitated the rest 75% original stock for the company's formation. This was the beginning of Wuxi's relationship with Suntech. The development approach that Wuxi pioneered, local SOEs directly provided equity capital and local government led in support fund, bank loans and production factors to promising companies, became known as the Wuxi Model.

In the years after its incorporation in 2001, Suntech successfully ramped-up production. However, sales were unsatisfactory and the local government had to infuse liquidity into the company. It did so in 2003 and 2004 by signing two loans of RMB 50 million and channeling RMB 40 million worth of support fund to Suntech (Xiao Lin, 2012, <http://comments.caijing.com.cn/2012-08-22/112073873.html>).

When former Premier Wen Jiabao in 2005 introduced the 11th five year plan to the public, he explicitly stated that the commercialization of renewable energy industries is a key area of development. The announcement coincided with accelerating growth of the international PV markets, especially in Europe. For the local government of Wuxi, a city in Jiangsu province, this was the starting call to improve the city's positioning within the solar industry. Local officials saw showing clear support for the new plan as beneficial to the local economy and potentially their future career prospects. Setting quantifiable goals for local government officials is an important tool for China to align regional and national aspirations. Once an official beats the benchmark numbers assigned to him, the official would be recognized as a strong leader in booming local economic and might expect a promotion within the state system. Due to the importance of this process for the future career, aspiring officials are highly compelled to beat the numbers with virtually any means at their disposal. Often, the race to deliver the right numbers by individual local officials is in disregard to any long-term consequences because the risk of being reprobated for a past decision is very low.

Also, they expected that creating a success story in Wuxi could kick-start the development of a local PV chain industry.
