This table illustrates how the various positions are established; the fingering for same is governed by a simple method of advancing the hand in step-wise progression along the fingerboard, and in this way enabling control of each higher succession of intervals with the same fingers.

Lines connect the notes across the staves, showing a diagonal progression from left to right, which illustrates how the hand moves up the fingerboard in step-wise fashion. The notes are organized into groups for each string: E string (top line), A string (second line), D string (third line), and G string (bottom line). The fingerings are consistently applied across positions, demonstrating the systematic nature of the method.

In systematizing the fingering as best suited to all the intervals on the fingerboard it so happens that in the first position any note below A on the G string, below E on the D string, below B on the A string, and below F# on the E string, can be played with the first finger. If the first finger is lowered on the G string to play A $\flat$  or G $\sharp$  and raised again for A $\natural$  the hand is in the first position, but if instead, the first finger remains on the lowered note and the next
