

My 2009 book Przekraczanie granic: eseje z filozofii historii i teorii historiografii [Bordercrossings: essays on the philosophy of history and theory of historiography]¹ is entitled thus because its chapters are located in the borderlands between history and philosophy. They are based on my research in philosophy of history and historiography over the past 20 years. Although they have been produced in a numerous contexts and have been published in a variety journals and collected volumes, there is some underlying coherence which connects them and which I shall address in this introduction. At the same time, the selected articles represent articulations of my own position in theoretical and historiographical debates.

Three basic ideas: 'cross-disciplinarity', 'conceptual inversion' and 'essentially contested concepts'

The first basic idea which connects the articles is that the writing of history has a "border crossing" character, meaning that history writing involves bordercrossings, first, between history and philosophy and second, between history and "politics" in a broad sense. History is often characterised as "a discipline of context" and historiography can, in my view, only be understood by contextualising it, both in cross-disciplinary and in political ways. Although this may sound pretty "postmodern" to some, my arguments in case are usually directed against and opposed to "postmodernist" positions. The second basic idea connecting the articles is the idea that the mechanism of "inversion" (or "negation") is important for our understanding of debates in philosophy of history and in historiography. I would even suggest that this holds for intellectual history in general. The "dialectical" mechanism is
