

Both ends are fixed against axial or lateral displacements, structure:

Total change in length is zero because the ends are fixed which will not allow the sections to expand or contract. Load or stress is produced by expansion or shrinkage of the sections is taken by the ends. Therefore ends carry same load or stress.

Using principle of superposition the reactions at the end of each section is found from free body diagrams. Equate the direction of force in free body diagrams to force applied for each section.

The equation shows that the section AB and BC is under tension and CD under compression. The direction of load in each section can be chosen as we desire, but if the load is negative then the direction chosen is incorrect but the answer is correct. In all other words tensile force is actually a compressive force vice versa.

Sum of change in length of each section due to expansion is equal to sum of change in length of each section due to compression. The load P, length L, Area A, and Young's modulus E parameters may vary from section to section.

$$\text{Expansion section} = \text{Compression section}$$

$$k_1 \times \Delta_1 + k_2 \times \Delta_2 + \dots + k_n \times \Delta_n = k_{n+1} \times \Delta_{n+1} + \dots + k_m \times \Delta_m \text{ Equation (2)}$$

Using equation 1 and 2 the problem can be solved.

Both ends are fixed against axial or lateral movement, section, both ends:

First solve the problem like both ends free or one end fixed. When the ends touch the both the support then solve the problem like both ends fixed.
