Abstract

This study examined stakeholders' assessment of mass media sensitisation on local government autonomy in South-South Nigeria. The research adopted the survey method and sampled 395 respondents drawn from a population of 33, 400 staff members of the Local Government Service Commissions in the three South-South states of Akwa Ibom, Cross River and Edo. The objectives of the study included: to find out the extent of exposure to mass media reports on local government autonomy among the South-South stakeholders; to ascertain whether the South-South stakeholders perceived media reports on local government autonomy as satisfactory and to determine whether the South-South stakeholders have confidence in the mass media to facilitate the realisation of local government autonomy in Nigeria. Findings from the study showed that exposure to mass media reports on local government autonomy among stakeholders in the South-South zone of Nigeria was high and their satisfaction with the level of media reportage on local government autonomy was not substantial while their confidence in the mass media capacity to facilitate local government autonomy through media hype was high and considerable large in terms of percentages. Based on the above findings, the study concludes that though the local government stakeholders in the South-South geo-political of Nigeria are highly exposed to mass media reportage of the quest for local government autonomy, they perceive the coverage given by the mass media as just moderate and inadequate. It therefore recommends that the mass media should see the quest for local government autonomy as a project and help to facilitate the realisation of full
