Abstract

Attaining economic development has remained a challenging phenomenon in Nigeria and to surmount this challenge the government since 1999 gradually started moving towards a market economy to replace the hitherto mixed economy structure. Consequent upon this, the study sets out to answer the following questions: what are the operational requirements of a market economy? Has the government provided these operational requirements for an effective installation of market economy? The work relied on secondary sources of data and came up with the findings that, Nigeria has majority of its population doing business and this is a good means for the country to eradicate poverty. However, Nigeria's inadequate enabling environment made business operation a struggling venture with discouraging outputs. This phenomenon has accentuated mass poverty and impeded the attainment of economic development for the country. Recommendations were made on how all these could be ameliorated.
