

1. Construction Estimates

SUMMARY

Estimating is an activity performed automatically in our daily activities. We estimate distances, time, temperature, weight, and so on with little thought to the estimating process. Actually, these are more or less fixed quantities that we learn as we mature. We develop a feel for them. Estimating construction work requires a little more systematic approach. This is so because of the large number of variables present. Costs, for example, are not subject to any rational control and can change quite a bit. Labor productivity, the other ingredient in estimating, has to be learned but in most cases is second hand information to the designer. Nevertheless, the accurate estimating of construction costs is essential.

The more detailed and comprehensive an estimate the greater its value. While detail might be limited by the available information, other components not so limited must be fully utilized. This Chapter contains a description of these components. Information available is used at different times in the design process to produce different estimates. There are, of course, several methods of estimating plumbing and fire protection work and these are illustrated.

Accurate estimating is the key ingredient to several other important activities. The information gathered for the estimate will be used in life cycle analyses and various cost control operations. From total costs, we can back track into manpower requirements and into scheduling assistance.

There is a cost for accurate estimating which should not be left without consideration. This and the results of poor estimating on the design fee are also covered in this chapter.

ESTIMATE COMPONENTS

An estimate is an opinion. In this book we shall estimate the cost of plumbing and fire protection construction. Such estimates consist of two major cost blocks. These are: costs related to the physical nature
