Introduction

Literacy is a broad and still largely unexplored terrain with many entrances and exits. Linguists, psychologists, sociologists, anthropologists, educators, administrators, and other specialists have made familiar trails without necessarily crossing each other's path. Individual vantage points—including my own—may offer only limited views.

My essays into literacy have been digressive, helped perhaps, by the fact that I have been led by no specific concern beyond my own questions about language and learning. I have no ambition to develop a commercial reading or writing program; I am reluctant to tell teachers what they should do; and I am too realistic to expect to change the world. I find language fascinating and have felt free to meander through its landscapes, guided by chance and my own instincts, wandering away from beaten tracks, following trails if they appear to promise rewarding perspectives and giving them up when they become dead ends.

The thirteen papers that I have selected for the present volume were written over a period of 10 years, when I also wrote half a dozen books on a similar range of topics. The books are milestones of organized journeys, major enterprises planned in advance. The
