This essay will first provide an analysis of a text, World of Cooking by Boeuf Borgingnonne (see supplementary materials) by focusing on the theory and methods of the Russian Formalists. I will then provide a brief critical discussion of the analysis and theory used.

To begin analysis I will look first at the device of linguistic sound. The Formalists started out by seeing the literary work as a more or less arbitrary assemblage of devices ... Devices included sound, imagery, rhythm, syntax, meter, rhyme, narrative techniques, in fact the whole stock of formal literary elements. (Khosravishakib 12). In order to appreciate the astonishing sophistication of Russian Formalist theory, and, indeed, even to understand what the Russian Formalists were about, we first need to understand the critical context in which Russian Formalism developed (70). This is a non-literary text (though in theory one could debate otherwise) that much is granted, but the fact remains that context is not a factor in needed in understanding the text in terms of literariness for the Russian Formalists. I have noted through much of the essays on Formalism that perception, which is a thread of understanding, is a key factor. In this case a critical context should be taken into account in all texts in order to provide a means of
