Cash on the Block Beryl Satter, 2026 An incisive history of government and corporate failures to infuse capital into Black urban neighborhoods as well as the organizers and activists who stood up to predatory financial practices In the 1960s conditions in impoverished Black neighborhoods attracted mainstream attention as civil unrest erupted in hundreds of cities across the United States Finally recognizing the dire effects of racial segregation and urban disinvestment politicians and corporations joined community activists to call for capital infusion or reinvestment in struggling communities Proposals for reinvestment universally claimed the shared goal of reviving Black neighborhoods but most of these efforts some well meaning others cynical and predatory failed to do so As renowned historian Beryl Satter shows private and government interests have long manipulated reinvestment programs to benefit outside business finance and real estate professionals Because these programs focused on corporate tax breaks and federal insurance for lenders they were easily exploited by private interests to divert funding from poor urban neighborhoods Meanwhile community organizers proposed much bolder reinvestment plans that directly confronted institutionally racist practices They called for a significant reallocation of resources including government investments in depleted areas and guaranteed incomes for poor people Activists often working class women also united across racial divides to challenge predatory finance and real estate practices Yet while they successfully advocated for laws to impede such behaviors reform legislation often contained loopholes that accommodated racism and corporate greed To revive depleted neighborhoods we must not only challenge institutional racism in finance and real estate but also resist government policies that enable predatory practices Cash on the Block envisions a future in which reinvestment policy guided by community leaders at last benefits those who it is meant to serve Mariners Weather Log, 1999 November issue includes abridged index to yearly volume *H.O.
